You should never rely on doom-gloom predictions as a debate tactic ("If we don't fight this war over there, millions of Americans will die and we'll cease to be a nation."), as they dig you into the hole of being vindicated by Americans dying and America losing wars. Rely instead on real-world security arguments built around "threat analysis" and "acceptable risk."

Particular attention is directed to continental expansion, the American Civil War, French-English relations in Canada, and the situation of North America's native populations. Materials for the first two sections of the course include texts produced between 1492 and the early twentieth century, as well as later works that address the historical developments of earlier periods.
